Looking north: President Reagan observing North Korean positions, and talking to the commander of a US guard post.

Massive security for President's DMZ visit

President Reagan could not have had a more dramatic forum in which to encapsulate the anti-communist rhetoric of his Asian tour. Less than two miles to the front was the North Korean border. Just behind, two sandbagged mortar posts and, beneath his podium, a crescent of men of the US Second Division, Ninth Infantry, whose job it is to patrol the Demilitarized Zone that separates North and South Korea.

Spain's prospects in the EEC

Rural discontent along the banks of the misty Ebro

EBRO JOURNEY Part 1

Whatever the outcome of next month's European Community summit in Athens, Spain will remain a firm candidate for eventual membership of the EEC. Applying a human yardstick to the country's problems, far from the Madrid ministries, Richard Wigg, Madrid correspondent, has travelled down the Ebro, Spain's most important river, from Cantabria to the Mediterranean and through the heartland likely to be most affected by the EEC. In this first of four articles, he reports from Reinoso.

An autumn Sunday morning and mist still clings to the green Cantabria hills at whose feet water wells up in a glade. Not far from the source of the Ebro, a party of local farmers, Reinoso factory executives, a solicitor and a bank manager, are shooting fallow deer or wild boar, rest after the dogs have again failed to pick up the scent.

His mother, after he has gone, asks me: "Couldn't you do anything for him? He's like a bird in a cage." The father burst out: "Let them open the factory doors again and give the young people jobs". Eduardo was born into a family on the bottom rung of Spain's one million smallholdings, which have virtually no economic future in a market economy unless they can be modernized.

Later in the journey, I was to hear Señor Carlos Romero, the Agriculture Minister, promise schemes to encourage unemployed young people to return to the villages and recultivate the land. But the rural exodus to the factories of the Franco years left older people to do the job, or the women alone. More than 60 per cent of Spain's farmers are aged between 40 and 60. Once the taste of modern urban living standards has been acquired, it is an uphill task to redirect young energies to the land and modernize techniques. And, bitter twist, modernization means fewer farm-workers. Tomorrow: The grape pickers.

MODERN TIMES

The Great Taste Test

A sideways look at the British way of life

Stephen Bayley is director of the Conran Foundation's Boilerhouse Project at the Victoria & Albert Museum. As such he has arranged the current exhibition devoted to taste, in which artefacts are placed upon pedestals or on dustbins to indicate the judgments that people have passed upon them. This deliciously provocative approach smacks, of course, of the sort of thing that gets good taste a bad name.

De gustibus non est disputandum. One man's meat has always been another man's poison. Bayley having thrust himself among the tastemakers, by making a show of other people's value judgments, becomes himself a touchstone for taste. Practical or preposterous? Robin Young visited him both at work and at home to collect evidence.

Then Sir Roy Strong, the Director of the Victoria & Albert Museum, was asked to consider the taste displayed by Bayley's possessions and give his verdict: is he a man of good taste or bad?

Exhibit A: Bayley at work

Exhibit B: Bayley at home

To get to the Boilerhouse before the V & A opens one must use the tradesman's entrance. Bayley, built more like a rugged player than an aesthete but with a coral red woolie scarf twirled tastefully about his shoulders, conducts the way through a clutter of scaffolding and past piles of disjointed drainpipes of doubtful purpose. "This was once a foetid bunker", he announces proudly, as he throws open the blank door to a clinically clean office that is all white, black and nunnish grey.

from an Apilco cup and saucer - oot in the familiar bottle-green and gold favoured by French brasseries, but white lined with silver grey. The principal furniture is a black Conran table, surrounded by black and chrome Mies van der Rohe chairs. "They are awful as sitting machines. Tom Wolfe says they're guaranteed to catapult your guests face first into the lobster bisque. Anyway, meetings tend to be short".

Behind his functional white desk he has compromised with a more conventional office chair - a Klöber Sitzkomfort on wheels. Down shelving on the side wall are ranged magazines of the technology and design business - "my daily reading" - but among the vivid display are Forbes, New York, Atlantic and French Vogue.

clean, calm and unassertive environment we found it was like working in a swimming pool or speaking on a transatlantic telephone line. We oceded an anechoic system, and this carpet is it. We found it in a junk shop. It is the sort of thing that Herbert Read, Niklaus Pevsner and John Betjeman coodenned as suburban awful good taste. I think it is rather subtle." Bayley sits comfortably in his Klöber cootemplating the scene. "My clothes", he says smoothly, "were of course chosen in consciousness that you were coming. They are all from Paul Smith in Covent Garden. There are small and subtle points in the cut and design which please me - extra darts in the trousers, the lie of the reverte, the unexpected angle of the buttonhole. Paul tells me it is quite impossible to sell such understatement outside London. People in the North, where we both come from, want something far more strident if they are going to speed money on clothes".

Bayley lives in Vauxhall, in a street which my colleague Bryan Appleyard defines as "the mystical home of gentrification". He arrives for our appointment in his white Volkswagen Sirocco. Its sombre interior complements the Prince of Wales check of his suit. "I would like a Ferrari", he says, "but I would have to save up for a long time. I have a strong Calvinistic streak. I would rather do without something than have anything I do not like. I am the opposite of a collector. I am a great thrower-away. Having brought the contents of two flats to this house, my wife and I have just finished throwing it all out to create a stripped environment. I have an obsession about clutter."

The stripped environment is most nakedly exposed in the basement, a big bare room with the classic Habitat dining furniture grouped at the far end - a Marcel Breuer dining chair and a black Italian table. A Japanese-influenced lamp by Ingo Maurer came from a Conran shop sale, but oost shelving below the stairs for wine bottles (mostly Italian from The Winery) was custom-built by a student from the London College of Furniture ("took an age").

love New York" heart) pave the way to the kitchen, tizzy pine units at which Bayley winces. "It was all here when we bought. It would be wantoo to rip it out", he says, turning his back and heading upstairs. His study has Finnish beech furniture and an arbitrary display of choice objects, prize among which is the filler cap from an F4 Phantom jet - "a wonderfully made thing". There are also his old typewriters, the upright Remington circa 1935 on which he wrote his first book, the Olivetti Lexikon 83DL on which he did his second, and the Olivetti Dora 12 designed by Sottsass in 1964. There is another Tizio lamp and a Danish telephone which will not connect to the British system. Sadly it is also oot grey.

I bang my head sharply on an overhanging lamp (glass flanges and coloured acetopiece designed by Paul Henningsen in 1928. "It would be better over a dining table", Bayley apologizes, "but it does give a beautifully muted light". At 32, Bayley has only just purchased his first sofa. It is Conran, square-built salmon pink with elegant grey piping, and about the size of an ocean liner. It is matched, Bayley points out, by the pink marble hearthstone he had found for the room. Otherwise there is only space for bookshelves, a Sony television on a wall bracket, a lamp suspended from a sweeping arc of chrome, and a couple of shining chrome stools like tractor seats. Like the tall lamp in the adjoining room which points a car headlamp at the ceiling, the stools, Bayley says, were designed by Achille Castiglione long before hi-tech became fashionable. Otherwise the second room has only an overcast stored oil painting (Death of St. Francis) of the Spanish school, and a set of folding canvas chairs, being reconvassed in salmon.

Bayley's bazaar

Watch: Rolex Oyster Perpetual ("only my stopwatch is quartz")
Cologne: Vetivert by Givenchy
Dictaphone: Sony TC100
Loafer shoes: Bass Weejuns
Hairdressing: Leonardo in Via Dante, Milan ("but usually it is more convenient to go to Patsy at Olofson's ladies' hairdressing, Knightsbridge") Favourite toy: Falcon Safety Products' Dust Off canister of compressed air for blasting dust away. I love the aerospace details of it."

Beside a red glass bowl by Enrico Sottsass Jnr. set on the table, the only remaining colour in the room is on the white tile floor behind me - a geometric patterned carpet of 1930s design. "Having created this

Sir Roy's verdict: a waxwork in his own museum

Brave are the hearts and eyes and minds that pronounce on taste. They climb of their own volition beneath the microscope lens and the results are invariably fatal. Brave Mr Bayley of the red-rimmed spectacles (or at least on some days). May your hair go silver-grey soon to match your decor and thus extend your "quest for neutrality" to yourself. Beware, oh beware where your prognostications on taste have led you. You could be constructing sets for an updated version of Jacques Tati as M Hulot in Mon Oncle.

Sir Roy Strong: "prefer style"

Remember you are not an exhibit, even though your office is a lit-up showcase in which you sit, Tussaud-like, but a human being with passions and feelings and foibles whose expression explodes in clutter, the true mirrors of humanity and sentiment. All that spotless virgin white makes me worry about the cleaning lady and the dropped cap of coffee. It also makes me muse on the practicalities in terms of maintenance, wear and function. Here are chairs for a meeting which are "awful sitting machines"; here are magazines arranged as exhibits in a pattern and not as reading matter; here is a desk which only looks good when it is empty.

I am so glad to read that you have a sofa, even if it does look like an ocean liner. Perhaps it means that, one day, the words comfort and domesticity will enter your vocabulary and life. Perhaps ornament, pattern and decoration, in the form of textiles, wallpapers, paint and glaze will also give you delight as they have to the greatest designers and artists over the centuries. Perhaps plants and flowers and living things (you know, like cats and dogs) will give you joy and rise above being merely tasteful props.

because he's the only man she ever meets from Monday to Friday. The result might be more like Within these Walls than the original Compact, but it might stop thousands of misguided young women from thinking that working on a magazine is far more thrilling than becoming a chartered accountant.

"What you have to do is beware of lunch", is Tory MP Julian Critchley's advice to newly elected members of the House. Apparently men, especially those men who might conceivably have some influence in the world, are never given lunch - except for nefarious purposes. Once they're accepted a lunch date, they are for ever at the mercy of arms-dealers, drug traffickers and people who wish petrol to retain a high content of lead. Women, it seems, have a much better time of it. It is the time when young women often receive rehearsals of marriage and older ones get offered jobs. I once shared an office with a woman who every so often would announce she was going out to lunch. Wearing her best clothes, she would sweep out on clouds of perfume and not reappear for hours. When she did, she would immediately open a packet of sandwiches. I don't know what she did during those extended lunch hours, but I'm sure she would have poured scorn on Julian Critchley's warning.

Compact is out of puff of hopeful young women trying to survive on a small salary in an atmosphere almost as exclusively female as the girls' grammar school which I had just left. Compact was jam-packed with squeaky-clean young men who alternatively dazzled or depressed female members of the cast according to what was needed to provide a suitably cliffhanging end to an episode. Such men do not exist on real magazines, at least not within a desk-bopping distance of the departments where women work. Men like a bit of career structure, not to mention a bit of money, so they get fed into the system as accountants and trainee advertising representatives and come out the other end, glossily pin-striped with titles like Group Publisher or Managing Director (Sales). Women seldom make it to the executive floor. They are supposed to coot themselves lucky if they progress from secretary to fashion editor, even though the salary, should they do so, is much the same and their office just as shabby. The recompense for a meagre wage is, supposedly, being exposed to so much excitement, an excitement which I'm not sure is entirely beneficial. I have seen home editors of magazines spend days interviewing some rich and celebrated lady about her Chelsea penthouse, with the silk walls and trompe d'oeil murals,

Penny Perrick

before taking the tube back to their own rented flats in Kilburn. I have seen junior fashion assistants retrieve clothes from models after a day's shooting, send them back to the Bond Street boutique from whence they came, and then go out in search of a cheap pair of Woolworth tights for themselves. You might suppose that these women would become consumed by the politics of envy, but they never are. Some of them stay on the same magazine all their working lives, no doubt always hoping that ooe day they'll walk into the familiar office to find it turned into something that looks just like the set of Compact. I'm oot sure that Compact, with its magazine fantasy world, will be able to stage a comeback in its original form, in this more world-weary television age. If it does return, I think it should be in the form referred to by socially realistic television directors as drama-doc. This would present the magazine office with the same cynical accuracy as Brookside presents life on a horrible housing estate. We would see the art editor bursting into tears because the colour proof of the front cover has come back from the printer showing the Princess of Wales with pink hair and orange eyeballs. We would watch the telephonist begin a long and wearisome love affair with the married production manager

Why the rich are happy when it rains.

Time was when a drop of rain cast a shadow of gloom on the Heaton-Smythes' social life.

But the Fisher Home Entertainment Centre, with 18" high definition colour television, 9 day record VHS video, a full range of stereo components including twin cassette deck, and CD Digital Audio Player has changed their way of thinking.

"Oh joy, Daphne, rain. Let's stay in with the Fisher."

Of course, the unlimited pleasure possibilities of the Fisher unit do present a few problems.

"Elsie Tanner, video re-runs of us at the Royal Wedding, Noël Coward recordings, Wogan, your Johnny Rotten tape, or the Peer Gynt Suite, Rodgers?"

Reassuringly, whatever their choice, they'll have access to the finest equipment available.

For instance, the colour TV has been precision engineered to deliver sharp picture definition right through to the screen's corners. And it features a 17 function remote control and direct video input.

The 615 VHS video has the facility to record up to 4 hours on an E-240 cassette, picture search functions like cue, review, freeze frame, and 9 function wired remote control.

And though Daphne Heaton-Smythe thinks "Wow" and "Flutter" are two dogs in the local hunt, her husband more sensibly realises the sound performance of Fisher high-fidelity is quite exceptional.

The system has outstanding features like direct-drive turntable, soft touch controls, 3-way speakers, and quartz locked synthesizer. It also boasts a twin deck cassette player with Dolby B and C and a stereo amplifier with graphic equalizer and an impressive 40 watts RMS.

Of course, the pièce de résistance is the CD Digital Audio Player with soft touch controls, 16 selection programme memory, and forward and reverse track selection.

You can start with a complete Fisher Hi-Fi system for as little as £299. But considering the Fisher Home Entertainment Centre offers so many components, a price of around £1,800 really isn't out of the question. Particularly, when one thinks of the amount of rain in Britain.

Cable & Wireless confounds forecasters

There are two big questions in analysts' minds concerning the telecommunications group Cable & Wireless. What will the interim profits be when the company reports tomorrow? And will the Government take the opportunity of likely bumper profits and the announcement of big Chinese contracts to sell half its 45 per cent holding? This stake of 100 million shares would raise £300m, based on the current share price of £3. Cable & Wireless is renowned among analysts as one of the most difficult companies to cover, which is reflected to some extent by the wide divergence of opinion concerning the interim results. Figures range from £80m to £90m against £67m the year before.

many problems. Last year it meant a profit contribution of £5m in the first half and £6m in the second. This year analysts reckon the weakness of the Hongkong dollar hit profits by as much as £6m, but then that currency weakness makes its Chinese tender that much cheaper. And the problems in Hongkong mean that the international telephone exchange - owned by C&W - will have seen a significant increase in use, if by no one else than the financial community. The company is known to have made substantial progress in other parts of the world and that rising trend of profits leads the City to expect up to £200m for the full year. Tesco, reporting its half year results on Wednesday, troubles analysts far less than C&W, as expectations falls within a range of £64m to £69m for the full year, with the interim figures forecast at £26m, up 30 per cent.

Despite the differential in margins, Tesco is still considered to have strong growth potential which it is fast exploiting. Kwik-Save, reporting its final results on Thursday, is another retailer analysts consider attractive. Although nowhere near the size of Tesco, brokers reckon the shares a strong buy. Pretax profits are forecast between £25m and £28m, with high expectations for the second half. The company has been expanding, albeit gingerly, in the North-east and the South and has a strong management record. The only management problem is the replacement of Mr Michael Weeks, the man responsible for choosing the supermarket sites. The group is beginning to face far more competition from Tesco's Victor-Value stores. Kwik-Save has opened 40 new stores and the company claims to be satisfied with the result. That programme of expansion is not expected to diminish in the current year, so the group looks set to threaten the bigger players in the not too distant future.

ECONOMIC VIEW

Spending figures to dominate

The week will be dominated by the Chancellor's autumn statement on Thursday when Mr Nigel Lawson will announce the outcome of the public spending review for the next year, and publish new Treasury forecasts for the British economy. On Wednesday, the first of the new monthly estimates of the public sector borrowing requirement (PSBR) is published for October. Central Government transactions, previously published separately, will be included. Figures for the first six months of the 1983-84 financial year suggested that the PSBR was likely to overshoot the Government's £2,200m target, by perhaps £1,000m or more. The City will be watching for some improvement in public finances in October, especially in central Government spending which has been running well above plan. Thursday sees publication of the output measure of third quarter gross domestic product, third quarter capital spending and stocks, and details of money supply growth in October, including bank lending. Figures for the output of the production industries for September and provisional October retail sales are out today. Most analysts expect a modest increase in industrial production but are divided over the outlook for retail sales with some seeing a further improvement in September's record level and others a decline. On Wednesday the Department of Employment publishes the average earnings index for September, and on Friday the Central Statistical Office releases the latest cyclical indicators for the British economy.

INVESTORS' NOTEBOOK • USM REVIEW

A shining Midsummer brew

Midsummer Inns, the old Camra (Real Ale) Investments, has quietly slipped from the beer swigging masculine embrace which gave it life and now a fully fledged commercial operation happy to live down its Camra origins. The company was born out of the traditional beer upsurge of the 1970s which convinced the brewing industry that there was still a profitable demand for traditional draught beer which had become an endangered brew in some areas.

Camra obligations, has been steady rather than spectacular, but Mr Nicholas Winterton, the Tory MP chairman, has indicated that current year's profits may not match last year's £57,000. The shares are 135p. Full details will be released tomorrow of Mebon, the industrial coatings and paints group which is due to arrive on the USM next Monday. Merchant bankers Hambros has yet to decide upon the placing price but around 95p seems likely. Mebon, which has grown partly on the back of the North Sea oil industry, seems the sort of candidate for which the USM was created. The founders, Mr. William Meakin, aged 57, and Mr. John Bourne, aged 52, will retain control and with their families will have 73 per cent of the capital after the share sale. Some of the cash raised goes to the founders; the rest to the company. Messrs Meakin (salesman) and Bourne (chemist) got together 20 years ago with the object of setting up a company making industrial coatings. Like so many other successful entrepreneurs they discovered a value of the market which was ready for exploitation. Their basic message is that their paints cost much more than the average do-it-yourself variety. But they list a lot longer, even under the most demanding conditions. Mebon, which once briefly dabbled in film finance and commodity trading, expects to make at least £800,000 in its current year. This would compare with £585,000. The company's profit record is a little erratic but the trend is decidedly upwards. When they started, Messrs Meakin and Bourne were backed by a family trust. It pumped in just £10,000. The trust sold in 1977 for £750,000. Repeating such a performance will almost certainly prove too daunting, but Mebon, with its rewarding part of the paints industry, looks set for further progress. Dealings are expected to start today in the Michael Page Partnership, specializing in accountancy and financial recruitment. Stockbroker Phillips & Drew has placed shares at 90p. Derek Pain

Gavaskar becomes world's most prolific Test batsman

Ahmedabad (Reuters) - Sunil Gavaskar, India's opening batsman, became the world's highest scorer in Test cricket here yesterday. He achieved this landmark on the second day of the third Test match against West Indies when he broke the previous best aggregate of 8,114 by Geoffrey Boycott.

Gavaskar, who needed 83 runs at the start of the current Test to best Boycott's total, was eventually out for 90 and missed by 10 runs a second record. He needs only one more century to break Sir Donald Bradman's total of 29 which he equalled in the second Test match in Delhi last month.

The Times guide to career choice

Graduate recruitment directories

Undergraduates in their final year who are currently considering their career options in the coming season will probably have already encountered one or more of the major graduate recruitment directories...

careers services themselves, many individuals have independently begun to reduce or restrict the numbers of the other directories they choose to distribute...

merely rather than replace them. All of them would be prepared to arrange some form of staggered distribution to ease services' logistical problems...

But the continued restriction placed on the distribution of their publications has fuelled the perception that "careers advisers' ability to judge the relative benefits of the various directories objectively is being stretched to the limit by the financial gain the service as a whole will make if ROGET is distributed in larger numbers...

"In the words of Mark Lane, DOG's publisher: "Careers advisers are still living in the Victorian age. They feel that if you are a professional, somehow you are with a capital 'B'. They want to maintain their image of themselves as professionals and stick to the concept that 'oanoy koows best'...

This was reiterated by AGCAS's new chairman, Robert Porter. He said "ROGET was conceived in 1975 by a group of careers advisers who felt the need for a concise and comprehensive reference source on graduate employers, and in particular one that would make available to students information on the many employers who did not issue recruitment literature to all careers services or advertise in the careers directories...

"ROGET has been developed as a compendium with a role different to that of the main commercial directories and is not designed to give vacancy information. Vacancies - especially in these uncertain times - can rarely be predicted 15 months before graduate is available for employment..."

Other services say that, with four directories now available for students, it is no longer reasonable for them to be expected to handle, store and distribute all of them in the same quantity as in the past. A few concede however, that this argument is often being used as a convenient way to favour ROGET above the other directories...

"Everybody, particularly the commercial publishers, are well aware of the jungle-like approach of the commercial world and it must be recognised that employers only have a limited amount of funds to invest in the recruitment of graduates..."

The commercial publishers concede many of the points put forward by the careers services. They agree that ROGET serves a different purpose to their own publication, but they argue that it should therefore comp-pete rather than replace them. All of them would be prepared to arrange some form of staggered distribution to ease services' logistical problems and two out of the three would consider the payment of reasonable handling charges to compensate for the problems of distributing their directories in bulk...

Robert Porter dismisses these allegations. He says: "Whether a university or polytechnic Careers Service distributes any directories is entirely a matter for the individual service. AGCAS has consistently made it clear that it has no intention of creating monopoly; indeed careers advisers value the commercial directories because they are different, and make them available to students..."

"The question has been raised as to whether the desire to ensure a sound financial basis for ROGET has led some careers advisers to be more restrictive over the distribution of the commercial directories. I do not personally see these issues as directly linked - what many careers advisers believe is that a rapidly changing graduate job market demands a different approach to employer and vacancy information..."

There is no doubt that a substantial majority of careers services would endorse Mr Porter's comments. But it is clear that a small but influential minority do not...

In the absence of any independent findings on the way in which students use the various directories, it is difficult to draw any absolute conclusion about careers advisers' misgivings concerning the commercial publications. But, with employers increasingly unwilling to place entries in all four directories and the commercial publishers already attempting to bypass the careers services by direct distribution to the academic departments, the issue is unlikely to quietly disappear...
